being the ingenuous crossing of an idiom set and a rhyming dictionary

Each of these works valorizes production, even “high” production, as an end in itself, eschewing the trappings normally associated with the grassroots underground such as the mimeo machine. Each deletes or minimizes conventional subjectivity even as, for the most part, they wish to tell stories or even gesture toward lyric poetry. Each seems to address on some level a breakdown of the private/public divide, and occasionally gestures toward the absence of civic spaces that are common to other cities: Shirinyan by displacing his own country from the center of the world, Place by taking us into the darkest corners of human immorality, Mosconi by blowing up his font size so that even reading from a magazine becomes a public act, Timmons by making a public show of a very private, largely unproductive, if not somewhat insane, activity and Durbin by disappearing entirely into the TV even as her “reality” shows depict events and neighborhoods just a few miles from her home. And though most of these works trouble some ethical dimension, even violently so, none of these works display a moral edge; that is, they don’t want to shame or seduce you into changing your life, but rather put you face to face with tons of raw, often controversial, occasionally cripplingly boring, linguistic and sensual data with the decisions for action left entirely up to you.

—Brian Kim Stefans
