NOTE

Renaissance Realism is composed entirely of found material. In the summer of 2008, as part of my job classifying data and building taxonomies for online contextual advertisers, I came across several web pages composed entirely of machine-generated text.

*A-ha! A manta ray is much more positive than an intimate rat.
Ugh! This sober mastodon indiscreetly awoke that dramatic hippopotamus.
Oh! The dolorous husky remotely touched some watchful iguanodon.*

Such “nonsensical” language was designed to attract automated advertisements from programs such as Google’s Adwords or Yahoo’s Sponsored Search programs; as such, they were designated spam. Naturally, I thought it was the perfect language with which to write a children’s book.

The sentences from these webpages, despite their strictly commercial intent, remain fascinating. They are odd in the ways only machine-generated text can be. Each sentence begins with an interjection and follows a similar syntax: animal X is compared to, interacts with, or otherwise corresponds with animal Y. The sentences are elliptical and suggestive, juxtaposing each animal type with the anthropomorphic narration of their actions.

Fifteen sentences were illustrated by the artist Scoli Acosta and compiled into an as yet unpublished children’s book called As Above, So Below. The sentences compiled here in Renaissance Realism are the unused “outtakes” or “rejects” from that project.

An excerpt from Renaissance Realism was previously published in Nightpapers 7 under the title Renaissance Humanism.
